ANGELA: You have. I'm the customer services manager. My name's Angela. So how can I help you?

MAN: Well, I'm calling from Barrett and Stansons, we're a medical company based in Perth.

ANGELA: Oh yes.

MAN: And we're organising a conference for our clients. We're expecting about fifty or sixty people.

ANGELA: When were you thinking of having it?

MAN: Some time early next year, like the end of January.

ANGELA: Let me see ... our conference facilities are available from the 28th. We could do the first weekend in February?

MAN: How about January 21st?

project done for an airline, respondents used their smartphones aiming at tracking the emotions of passengers during a flight.

So what makes studies like these different from ordinary research or ethnographic research in business. First of all, the researchers thought up a hypothesis to be tested, as is the case in other types of the research to inform them. As far as choosing the participants is different from ordinary research – the criteria according to which they are chosen are simple as the age bracket they fall into, or the researchers try to find a set of people who all use a particular product, or a particular type of people as participants. As well as the criteria I've mentioned, the researchers are being watched as they go about their activities [38]. Actually, it's maybe because they're often in their own home or workplace. So what makes this type of research special is that it's not just about observing; instead the research is usually based on first-hand observation. This means that the researcher never talks to the participants. He or she is a participant rather than the researchers who decides what to observe. The likelihood of the researcher imposing his or her own ideas on the participants is very low.

But after they've said goodbye to their participants and got back to their office, the researchers' work isn't finished. In fact, researchers estimate that 70 to 80 per cent of their time is spent not on the collecting of data but on its analysis.
